About
A persistent debate over the last few decades has focused on the question: where does the concept of human rights originate? Does it come from our Christian-Jewish roots or is it an invention of the Enlightenment? It is neither one nor the other according to the social theorician Hans Joas, who narrates quite a different history of human rights in his latest publication.

In the style of a »historical sociology«, he unearths a surprising perspective: the notion of universal human dignity is the result of a process of sacralization, during which the individual human was regarded as increasingly more sacred. Joas traces this process in exemplary studies, such as the abolition of slavery and the genesis of paradigmatic »Declarations of Human Rights«, analysing them as a complex cultural transformation.

Human rights, as is illustrated here, are not simply the result of a simple consensus on universal principles: they originate from a long, cultural interdisciplinary discourse on values. Their history consists of many stories: these have been narrated by Hans Joas in a gripping book that reopens the debate on the concept of human rights.

Praise
»This important book by Hans Joas presents a valuable and well-balanced account of how the notions of human dignity and human rights were born out of the mutually inspiring combination of secular and religious thought, interpretation, and action.« SZ

»A profound book [...] that demonstrates the patience and tenacity needed to develop thoughts and present them not only clearly but elegantly.« Otfried Höffe, FAZ

»Despite the occasional use of highly specialised jargon, this book is an intellectual pleasure to read. It is certainly never boring.« Deutschlandradio
